

"Villages are Converting into Cities"

—A reflection on transformation, memory, and loss

Once, the village was a quiet whisper beneath the sky—a place where time moved like the breeze through wheat fields, where every home knew its neighbor, and stories lived longer than roads. But now, that whisper is growing into the roar of engines, the shimmer of neon, and the weight of concrete.

Villages are no longer staying still. They are growing limbs of steel and glass, stretching into cities. Paths that once led to wells now lead to parking lots. The courtyard that held laughter now echoes with silence, replaced by closed doors and hurried footsteps.

This transformation isn't just physical—it's deeply emotional. It is the slow fading of folklore into forgotten files, the replacement of handwoven warmth with cold, calculated architecture. The soul of the village—its trees, its shadows, its rituals—remains hidden beneath layers of urban ambition.

And yet, somewhere in the dust and light of this change, a question lingers: Is progress worth the price of forgetting who we were?
